

Ginkgo Tree Project Summary

Background

Last semester, eight ginkgo tree saplings were planted on the lawn between the E. Craig Wall, Jr. Academic Center and the Sculpture Garden outside the Little Library. As the descendants of trees surviving the atomic blast in Hiroshima, they were donated by Green Legacy Hiroshima in Japan, an organization committed to sharing a “double message” about the “dangers of arms of mass destruction and nuclear weapons in particular” and “the sacred character of mankind and the resilience of nature.”¹ It has been working on the grassroots level to bring together people who suffer from conflicts and share a message of peace, coexistence, and hope.²³

In 2016, Dr. Kristi Multhaup, Vail Professor of Psychology at Davidson College, connected with the organization during her participation in the ASIANetwork seminar in Japan and launched the initiative to bring seeds from these Ginkgo trees to the Davidson campus. This effort involved a cross-department collaboration that stretched from the Biology and East Asian Studies Department to Physical Plant to the Office of the Vice President for Academic Affairs.

The tree planting event made efforts to acknowledge a broader history of World War II in the Asia-Pacific region beyond the atomic bombing in Hiroshima. However, while providing important background about the Ginkgo trees themselves, the initial news report on the project did not capture the full complexity of this history. Students and alumni of Chinese and Korean backgrounds expressed frustration that their perspectives were not represented, and they raised concerns that the Ginkgo trees alone did not convey the multifaceted nature of the roles that Japan and other countries played in World War II.

Education about World War II in the United States often emphasizes the tragedy of the atomic bombings, with limited attention to the Imperial Government of Japan’s invasion of Burma, China, Indonesia, Korea, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore, Thailand, Vietnam, and other countries in the region. As a result, students without personal connections to these countries may have a narrower understanding of this period and not appreciate the complex roles that different actors played in the war. A more nuanced, inclusive, and historically-informed appreciation of these complexities would help everyone reflect on the effects of war and the need for efforts to preserve peace between nations.

The Project

Dean of the Faculty Shelley Rigger has asked the Deliberative Citizenship Initiative (DCI), together with interested student organizations, departments, and faculty members, to help organize a deliberative process for Davidson students, faculty, staff, and alumni to develop interpretive materials related to the Ginkgo trees that were planted in Spring 2024 between Chambers, Wall, and the Little Library. The idea emerged to develop signage about the trees that provide more context about the Ginkgo trees and why they were planted. This language could be displayed as signs, text, or in more creative ways using audio recordings, QR codes, or other interpretive materials.

This initiative aims to focus on WWII in the Asia Pacific as a case study of the pain and harm of war, without focusing on specific historical disagreements, controversies, and questions of blame and fault. Beyond presenting the historical context related to the Ginkgo trees, this project hopes to inspire reflection and foster meaningful conversations among students, faculty, staff, alumni, and community members about the horrors of war that lead to profound losses of human dignity and personhood.

The central question we – together with interested student organizations, departments, and faculty members – will be helping our community engage with is the following:

- What should we say, as a community, about the legacies of WWII in the Asia Pacific region that captures the universal experience of harm to human beings in war and respects the diversity of perspectives on this question?

The DCI plans to host a Deliberative Forum with interested co-sponsors in the Spring of 2025 to explore this question and chart a path forward on this project. If you are interested in participating in this forum or getting involved in this project, please reach out to Keya Zhou (kezhou@davidson.edu) or Graham Bullock (grbullock@davidson.edu).
